Summer is wrapping up – in many ways it is the busiest time of year in an academic medicine department. July marks the start of a new academic year – we bring on our new resident classes; many of our new faculty, whom we’ve recruited and prepared for over the preceding months, come on board during the summer; graduating Residents and Fellows transition to new roles and jobs; and some of our faculty depart: some to exciting new chapters in their professional life, and some to enjoy the pleasures of retirement. This is the normal rhythm of the Department of Surgery.

The summer of activities, of comings and goings and all the events associated, inspired focus on the “Community” of the Department of Surgery. Thinking about our community – what makes it happen, how it thrives and endures – first requires that we develop a shared understanding of what it means. Authors McMillan and Chavis note some important attributes of Community in their 1986 article “Sense of community: A definition and theory”: a sense of belonging and identification, a feeling of influence, group cohesiveness and boundaries, emotional safety, shared values and personal investment in the community.¹

These attributes resonate with my sense of community within the Department of Surgery. I am proud and grateful the Department of Surgery has a strong sense of community that we continue to build and expand. I was powerfully reminded of this at our first annual summer all-faculty, staff, and trainees “Pellegrini Day,” picnic held on July 14, 2019. Not only was it a community-building event which was well attended by all segments of our Department and their families, but we also had opportunity to hear from Dr. Pellegrini. He reflected on the Department and noted that with the benefit of time since leaving his post as Chair, he realizes how unique the sense of community in the Department of Surgery is. We get along, there is a sense of camaraderie and belonging, shared values, mutual respect and personal investment. He noted that while there certainly are other Departments of Surgery that have strong community, we are unique in the strength of our relationships and the resilience of our shared purpose. Reading back through the tribute to Carlos upon his stepping down after 20 years as Chair in 2012, the testimonials tell us how much he had to do with building our Community. “He treats everyone like family.” “From him I learned how to be a better clinician, educator and surgeon, but also a better person.” “He taught me that we are not separate pieces: work life and home life, but a woven cloth of values and passions.”

We are good and have a solid foundation, but I would propose we are not yet great. I want us to be GREAT!

I have learned from many of you of the gaps and weaknesses in our community.

My column in the last issue of Surgery Synopsis focused on our Wellness Initiative. A bold plan was laid out, the primary goal of improving individual wellness to inspire better patient care. Secondary goals are: 1) promote rewarding work-life balance; 2) improve professional interactions; 3) sustain and energize morale; 4) build community; and 5) promote faculty satisfaction and retention. Our first step in this journey has happened: a comprehensive survey to all faculty, trainees and staff has just closed and we are awaiting compilation and analysis of the data. We are excited to learn where we are and to use the data to map our future directions in this arena.

Another important aspect of community-building is to continue our journey toward greater diversity and inclusion. The Department of Surgery co-sponsored a June event including a symposium, conversations, and lectures regarding racism in medicine and its impact on health disparities. Dr. Rachael Hardeman and Dr. Eduardo Medina were the invited guests. The sessions were thought provoking and difficult, but necessary conversations took place. This event culminated with a Grand Rounds entitled “Structural Racism and Clinical Practice: Challenges and Opportunities.” We were pleased to have participated in making this event a reality. Please read more about it on page 11.

Our community has brought on some outstanding new faculty. Please read about them on page 8. Our new group of residents and fellows continues to be a strong, diverse group of doctors and we’re proud to have them join us. Please read about them and view the pictures of our new residents and fellows on pages 4 and 6.

We’ve also said goodbye to a truly outstanding faculty member: We lost Dr. Joseph Gruss to pancreatic cancer in June. He was a Pediatric Plastic/Craniofacial Surgeon & Professor Emeritus. He lived a remarkable life and his work was world-renowned. Read the touching tribute to him on page 3.
